4. Whenever land is required for the formation of new villages, it should be selected for on a high dry ground, but not near paddy fields, where people are liable to get fever. The streets should, at least, be ten yards broad so as to admit plenty of air. Neem trees may be planted, which will not only give healthy shade but add to the beauty of the village.

5. The practice of excavating mud for the walls of houses from the ground in their immediate vicinity should be strictly prohibited as these excavations are used for throwing village sweepings and filth of all sorts into them, which during the rainy season, form stagnant pools of unwholesome and offensive character.
